

“THE INVENTION OF TEA is a wonderful happening. At least, tea brings family members together and gives one a rest from household duties... something uniting leads your minds to pleasant conversation. Old folks give up their distrustful looks and bond with the youngsters, and the youngsters become more warm-hearted and caring.”

Tea has always been a special element of Russian gastronomic culture, a well beloved drink and an original facilitator of social life. Family matters, trade contracts and marriages were accompanied by a cup of good tea.

Quality tea brew used to be a sign of hospitality. In the noble homes of St. Petersburg and Moscow they would serve the best tea varieties: black, yellow and green. A good tea brew, proper serving and samovar used to be essential elements of any tea table. And of course, no good tea would be served without pies, croissants, cracknels, gingerbread, coulibiac and sweet treats.

Tea drinking naturally complement the old traditions of hospitable Russian people. And now it has been for three centuries that no friends reunions, family events or business meeting happen without a cup of good tea. Every historical era brought about new rules of courtesy, new tableware and new treats. Yet the tradition of hospitality has remained unchanged: every single guest should be treated with a warm heart. Russian Vodka Room №1 is one of the first places where you can experience the true tradition of Russian tea ceremony.

At Russian Vodka Room №1 you can buy any tea blend you like, and also special gift sets for tea ceremonies that your friends and relatives will love.
